A friend told me that there are multiple approaches to keep something unique and secure (no one knowing about it). But I want to ask a question. First, let's say we want to keep a secret. If there is many classes of secrets, like it was under the storm before, would the solution still be to encrypt it and keep it in a database? I don't know much about encryption and I am interested if there is something better to do it than this? The problem with a classical "secret" is that everyone else can know it at least for a while. Let's say you want to keep a secret and you want to encrypt the keys you need to decrypt it. Then, someone knows the keys for a little bit (for as long as it takes to decrypt) and then you need to change the keys. To solve this problem, you could consider to take information that is more important than the information you want to
