Aloha world bros guys. .The future of renewable energy is electricity. It's portable, clean, a practical alternative to fossil fuels, and with solar and wind, it doesn't kill our planet. Clean energy jobs are already growing, with more than two million Americans working in the industry. Solar and wind alone will account for over 20 percent of total new power-generating capacity by 2025. That's a good thing: It's all the more reason to double down on renewable policies to drive down their costs and increase their scale. But not for the Koch brothers. Over the past few years, as the oil and gas industry has come under attack for its part in sooty air pollution, the Koch brothers have sought to enlist Republican elected officials, state and local officials, and others in what they see as a fight for "economic liberty." In their telling, attacks on fossil fuel production and consumption are attacks on the free enterprise system and the American dream. The problem with this logic is that this isn't about free enterprise, or American freedom. It's about free enterprise as defined by the right wing of the Republican Party, the billionaires who fund them, and the politicians who are bought and paid for. The Kochs and their allies have latched on to an ideology that's based on a false idea of an "efficient market." That marketplace is supposed to be a perfect place where unbridled capitalism and perfect information prevail. But in reality, it's a cutthroat place where a few powerful companies are established, subsidized by the government to the point of oblivion, and protected by powerful political forces. And so, they've come up with an alternative world view, one they call "economic freedom." They don't accept the idea of real political and economic checks and balances. Instead, they maintain a system in which a few powerful, politically connected corporations can determine and distort the market outcomes that ultimately affect our well-being. The Republican Party is the party of Koch. It's not just about defunding the EPA or cutting Medicaid to deny services to the poor. It's about pushing policies that favor big business, work against our health and
