In this Photoshop tutorial, we'll show you how to organize and reduce the size of a photo, leaving room for a new file. This tutorial does not show how to download new images for this particular project. You will need to research, learn, and use an image service (like Pixabay.com) before you can obtain photos for this project. Note: This is a very brief tutorial, so I recommend downloading and exploring the tutorials mentioned.

Step 1: Find Your Photo Set up your photo for use on this tutorial by selecting File>New>Image. Step 2: Set Up Your Project with the Crop Tool Apply the crop tool (C) to crop the photo in the active layer. You can extend the crop tool's bounding box by pressing and holding the Shift key when clicking the Crop tool. You can also change the selection mode to Continuous (F) or Feather (E) if you want to be able to drag around the edges of the selection box. Step 3: Choose a Fill Color Because we're starting with a fairly monochromatic image, we will fill in the area we've selected with one color. The image below is of a black background, so I will use a black fill color. Step 4: Choose and Set the Opacity of Your Fill Color The Opacity of your fill color is the percentage of the transparency of the color applied to the background of your selection box. In this example, I have a 75% Opacity. This fills the box, but leaves room for the new background. Step 5: Set Up a New Layer You will now create a new layer and use it to add color to the selections. Step 6: Select the Paint Bucket Tool Click on the selection tools icon (third icon from left on the toolbar) and choose the Paint Bucket Tool. Be sure the Brush Type is set to the Color panel, so that you have access to all the color panels to choose a color from. Step 7: Pick a Color Pick a color from the color panel and click on the image to apply it. In this example, I chose a dark blue for the background color. Step 8: Make Your Changes It's time to experiment with the size and placement of your new background. This is a large photo, so I will see the Atrioventricular dissociation Atrioventricular dissociation (AV-dissociation) is a relatively uncommon, but critical situation where one or both atria are effectively decoupled from the ventricles (although the condition can be transient). Since the atria are responsible for filling the ventricles with blood during systole, it is clear that the ventricles will not be able to deliver blood to the body and thus the patient will suffer severe cardiovascular compromise. The condition can be a life threatening situation in which patients will typically experience pulseless electrical activity, bradycardia or even asystole. Causes The primary causes of AV dissociation are: Acquired Congenital: 1) AVI conduction block at the bundle of His (acquired at birth) 2) Heartworm (acquired during early childhood) 3) Pulmonary stenosis, Mitral valve stenosis, and Atrial septal defect (acquired at later age) 4) Infant sudden cardiac arrest (acquired on the day of birth) 5) Long QT syndrome 6) Heart transplantation 7) Arrhythmogenic right ventricular dysplasia 8) Neurogenic syncope 9) Extensive myocardial infarction (acquired at any age) 10) Intra-atrial thrombus Primary: 11) Atrial flutter 12) Paroxysmal atrial fibrillation 13) Atrial fibrillation 14) Ventricular septal defect 15) Aortic insufficiency 16) Congenital bicuspid aortic valve Congenital ectopic pacemaker Drug overdose: 20–50% of infants with sudden cardiac arrest have a fatal outcome due to the maternal consumption of 10–50 mg of aminophylline/theophylline The other 25–50% of infants with sudden cardiac arrest survive. Most cases of acquired AV dissociation are due to the presence of some form of structural heart disease, either congenital or acquired. Other causes include drug overdose, in which high doses of aminophylline or theophylline (methylxanthines) can disrupt the AV node (from the overstimulation of parasympathetic fibres). A less common cause is genetic, which is the result of
