The term programming language usually refers to the language you use to write programs in, although it has other meanings (at least in the UK). People use programming language to refer to all the compilers, interpreters, libraries and so on that are used to run a program. Is there a term that encompasses the compilation process and all the processes that execute on the machine's CPU but that isn't compiler-specific? A: Computer program is a general term, that takes on specific meaning depending on the context. See this question and its answers for more on the linguistic and mathematical aspects of this usage. (I've included mentions of the programmer and computer, the latter being synonymous with computer program. Note that, even if these terms are synonymous, a given program might not be "a computer program" in the mathematically precise sense of a polynomial (I don't think such a thing exists). That is, one could program a computer to give out Fibonacci numbers, but the resulting program would hardly be recognizable as a computer program in the mathematical sense.) Finally, note that programming languages, as a linguistic concept function in.net datagridview I have a datagridview with a date column, and I am looking for a way to have the user input a date in the cell and then when they click the date in the cell the today date should be displayed. Below is the javascript function I have setup:

function todayButton() { var today = new Date(); var todayDate = today.getDate(); var todayMonth = today.getMonth() + 1; var todayYear = today.getFullYear(); var todayDateString = todayDate + "/" + todayMonth + "/" + todayYear; // display the current date 6d1f23a050
