in 2002, the new york times published a story on the impact of the encyclopedia on the country. the report from the baltimore sun highlighted the problem of biased facts on the part of major newspapers. the washington post reported that the encyclopedia had become obsolete in the united states. the wall street journal was highly critical of the encyclopaedia britannica, highlighting the decline of the product in the late 1990s. the new york times quoted a recent survey that indicated that the encyclopedia is no longer relevant in the 21st century. the survey showed that nearly half of the respondents could not name the year of the encyclopedia's last edition. the los angeles times reported that the encyclopedia has lost the u.s. market. according to the report, parents are using the encyclopedia less than they did 10 years ago. the report in the american journal of higher education added that the country's universities are using the encyclopedia as a resource for finding information. it cited a professor at the state university of new york at buffalo who is using the encyclopedia to teach students about the new world and the history of the united states. the professor said that the encyclopedia is becoming a significant source of information for students the encyclopedia's publisher, cambridge, reported that the the encyclopedia has been downloaded more than two million times since 1998. in 2010, the new york times reported that the encyclopedia was one of the most widely used reference works in the country, and that one in ten american adults turned to it as a main reference. the report cited a recent poll that indicated that most americans still use the encyclopedia for basic information.

the result? some glaring omissions, but also some glaring inaccuracies. the nature report was more about the public perception of wikipedia than about wikipedia itself. much of what was wrong with the report was its belief that britannica made no error and was thus not worthy of examination. whether that was the case or not, the naturesurvey, as with others, did not compare the quality of the entries. the wikipedia entry for nature asks a straightforward question: how much of the contents of the article can be verified? to that end, the naturereport is critical of britannica for containing entries which are vague, contradictory or based on speculation. the britannica entry on nature is entirely factual and gives no opinions. but thats not the point. the point is that one of the most respected names in the history of print, and certainly the most respected name in the history of scientific publication, was willing to admit that there were inaccuracies in its entries. the naturereport also did not examine the question of what proportion of the entries on the different websites are actually referenced in the britannica. so the answer to the question of whether the britannica has become accurate is yes, to the extent that it is a convenient, quick and free database and encyclopedia for the general public, but no, to the extent that it is a major reference work for scholars. if the naturereport is to be taken at face value, then the truth is that wikipedia may have a better claim to being the most accurate encyclopedia than britannica. its no wonder that the britannica is willing to admit this. if it did not, then it would lose its reason for being. if the britannica did not admit this, then it would probably lose its reputation as a long-standing and respected authority on scientific and historical knowledge. while wikipedia and britannica offer different services to their users, they both face the challenge of continually improving their reputations and maintaining their relevance. any contribution to this debate is much appreciated. 5ec8ef588b
