One of the technology investments made by Thomson in the 1980s was the acquisition of the company Chromacast. This technology allowed the display of Macintosh software and by the early 1990s, the vast majority of Macintosh computers shipped were running a version of the Macintosh operating system which allowed for the downloading of software from the Internet. This provided a level of freedom which Mac users had not experienced before. Now, instead of having to wait for a publisher to release a new game, they were able to download the program they wanted directly from the Internet. 5ec8ef588b
